HONOLULU'S FLORAL PARADE GORGEOUS ARRAY OF BEAUTY

AUTOS, VEHICLES and RIDERS APPEAR IN UNIQUE SPLENDOR

MAGNIFICENT PAGEANT SHOWS WHAT HAWAII CAN DO

IF THERE IS ANYONE in Honolulu who did not see the Floral Parade this morning, it is either some bed-ridden invalid who could not get out, or some fellow with a grouse against himself who was trying to get even with himself for existing by shuffling himself up in lonesome solitude. Everybody else was out, and those who did not go to the Capitol grounds to see the parade form, lined the streets through which the parade was to pass. And they all came early to get a good position.

Honolulu must be growing. There were more people out this morning than one would think lived in the city. The Capitol grounds were jammed, and the streets crowded. King street from above the Palace to far down toward the fishmarket was so full of spectators that the parade had hardly room enough to pass.

The most animated scene was that in the Capitol grounds, which was a kaleidoscope of color, movement, and beauty. It was here that the various participants in the parade lined up to be photographed. And they were photographed. Honolulu must have more cameras and kodaks to the number of its population than any other city in the world, judging by the number that were in evidence this morning. No sooner would an automobile, a troop of pa-u riders or a float stop than it would be surrounded by a battery of glistening lenses. The man—and woman—behind the camera was everywhere. And everybody snap-shotted everything. The busiest camera fiend was Honine, the moving-picture man, who was laying in a supply of material that will probably do more to advertise Honolulu and Hawaii than all the promotion literature that can be sent out. He had an opportunity that doesn't come very often, for the scene was one that could be viewed only in Honolulu at the time of the Floral Parade.

And the parade itself! Honolulu has had floral parades before, but they faded into insignificance in comparison with that one of February 22, 1908. Both in the number of participants and the magnificence of the decorations it was far and away in advance of any of its predecessors. It was a long, glittering river of color and animation. Decorated automobiles, carriages, floats, pa-u riders, cowboys, lady and gentlemen riders, riders in all sorts of costumes.

All Nations There
And it was a cosmopolitan affair. One fine automobile float represented the empire of the Mikado. The Chinese dragon wound its sinuous way along the crowded streets and one automobile was filled with Koreans.

But when Jamie Wilder, costumed as John Bull and accompanied by a number of other representatives of Merrie England, with the British lion rampant above them and the flag of the British Empire flaunting defiance to the American eagle and the memory of George Washington, came along, one enthusiastic patriot shook his fist in rage and bellowed, "That's an outrage. It ought not to be allowed in this parade. It's a shame. Put him out! Put him out!" But he wasn't put out, and the Enthusiastic Patriot appeared to be the only one who had any fault to find. Everybody else applauded and joshed Mr. Jamie Bull.

There were policemen everywhere, mounted on horses which had a predilection for trying to step on the toes of the outside line of spectators. The guardians of the peace galloped wildly about, ordering everybody back from everywhere, and appearing as excited as so many hens in a millpond. But nobody minded. Everybody was good-natured, and there wasn't a growl to be heard anywhere.

Tremendous Crowd

Wu Not To Hurry Exclusion Act Matters

"JUST now, I have no instruction to do anything to the Chinese Exclusion Act," answered Chinese Ambassador Wu Ting Fan, when interviewed this morning. "When I reach Washington," continued the learned diplomat, "I might do something. I am not quite ready to answer you intelligently on this subject just now. I am getting ready to go ashore and you must excuse me to prepare myself," concluded Ambassador Wu.

This reply was made when "Mr. Wu" as Roosevelt calls him, was asked by a reporter "Are you going to do anything with the Chinese Exclusion Act?"

"What's that, what's that, sir," came back the ambassador. The leading Chinese merchants, headed by Mr. Goo Kim and Mr. Chu Gem, president of the Chinese United Society, attired in their best Chinese costumes, were by special permission of Raymond C. Brown, chief U. S. Immigration Inspector, admitted on board the liner to meet their ambassador. This special permission was shortly afterwards extended to all the Chinese, who were eagerly waiting to go aboard and see their distinguished representative.

Ambassador Wu came out from his apartments and was soon introduced by Consul Chang to the local Chinese merchants. Rev. Thwing and his little

Wu At Commercial Club

The Commercial Club was filled to overflowing this noon when the club threw its doors open to members and friends for the entertainment of H. E. Dr. Wu Ting Fang, Chinese Ambassador at Washington.

The dining room was appropriately decorated for the occasion, the large American flag on the rear wall having associated with it the banner of the Chinese Empire.

Ambassador Wu arrived about 1 o'clock. He was accompanied by Consul Chang Tso Fan, and the leading members of the Ambassador's party. They were received by F. W. Macfarlane of the entertainment committee and President George W. Smith greeted the party as it entered the club room.

The special guests of honor were seated at the large "governor's" table. Ambassador Wu being seated between Governor Frear and President Smith. Prominent Chinese citizens were seated at a near-by table.
